The Dedication of St. James Cathedral

Sunday, December 22, 1907

On December 22, 1907, Bishop Edward O'Dea dedicated St. James Cathedral. Eighty-seven years later, Archbishop Thomas Murphy rededicated the Cathedral following an extensive restoration and renovation. Today, we look back to 1907 and to the busy months of the completion of the Cathedral.

Throughout 1907, Bishop O'Dea carried on a detailed correspondence with Benziger Brothers, the firm which supplied almost all the interior furnishings for the new cathedral. Bishop O'Dea ordered the altar, the altar rail, and a pair of angels holding electric-powered candelabra, which Benziger Brothers assured him were "in the best Renaissance style."

Benziger Brothers supplied smaller items as well – tabernacle keys, pew numbers, and collection boxes, not to mention 1,000 hat holders with nickel finish, priced at 25 cents each.

Bishop O'Dea hoped to dedicate the Cathedral on Thanksgiving Day, November 28, 1907, but as November drew nearer, it became clear that the building would not be ready in time. For one thing, he had yet to receive formal permission from the Holy Father to move the Cathedral to Seattle, and to change the name of the diocese from Nesqually to Seattle. (It finally came through on September 11, 1907, reaching Seattle about a month later.) Bishop O'Dea finally settled on December 22 – the Sunday closest to his ordination anniversary.

In the meantime, the local papers were very interested in the goings-on on the hill. The arrival of the decree from Rome was much discussed. "ROME DIGNIFIES QUEEN CITY," ran the headline in the Times. And the Seattle P-I announced that "SEATTLE WILL BE CATHOLIC CENTER: ROME YIELDS TO FACTS." Bishop O'Dea freely shared his opinions with the press: "Bishop E. J. O'Dea declares the new Cathedral to be the greatest Catholic Church building west of Pittsburgh and unequalled for beauty of architecture and design in the world." The proud Bishop sent invitations to the dedication ceremonies far and wide. The Times observed appreciatively that "it was notable that in the special invitations sent out by the church authorities, the religious views of the recipients were not regarded." Fully one-third of those who gathered for the dedication of the Cathedral were not Catholic.

The news media were also very interested in the rite of dedication: "In the dedication ceremonies ancient customs will be followed and what will be seen tomorrow will be a repetition of every ceremony of its kind that has taken place since the first Catholic church was dedicated," wrote a reporter from the P-I with more enthusiasm than accuracy. "Bishop O'Dea says customs may change, men may change, but the church never."

At last the day of dedication dawned. The ceremonies began at 9:00am, but the first part of the ceremony – the dedication of the altars – was witnessed only by the clergy. The huge crowds waited outside patiently for more than two hours before they were rewarded with a glimpse of Bishop O'Dea, as the procession came out of the Cathedral, and the Bishop blessed the exterior of the building. Then, at last, the doors were thrown open, and the people flooded in for the solemn Mass.

The interior of the Cathedral was not yet complete – in fact, only the altar and the organ case could be described as finished. And yet, with its airy interior, flooded with light through the many clear windows, and its impressive, forty-foot dome ("practically indestructible," the Times reported) the interior did not disappoint. The music – conducted and in part composed by the Cathedral's gifted new music director, Dr. Franklin Sawyer Palmer – was exceptional, and the 40-minute sermon by Bishop Carroll of Helena was, by all accounts, thrilling. It was a proud day for Catholics – a proud day for Seattle – and, perhaps most especially, a proud day for Bishop O'Dea.
